Spread love: Barry University remembers Pulse tragedy

BY BROOKE HENDERSON
bhenderson@miamiherald.com

A member of a Critical Incident Stress Management Team, Maria Teahan was deployed twice to respond to Pulse LGBTQ nightclub in Orlando after the worst mass shooting in U.S. history.

Teahan's team was one of many from around Florida responsible for helping the police officers and firefighters who responded to the tragedy cope with the aftermath. Many suffered from guilt, for the people they couldn't save and the colleagues they risked in the process. She said the stories the officers shared seemed as if they were talking about a war zone.

As they processed it, Teahan said they were still unable to really believe that the tragedy of June 12, 2016, had happened.

"They came in yelling, 'Get up, get up. We're the police. You're safe.' They couldn't see — it was pitch black — they didn't realize that all these people on the floor were actually dead," Teahan said. "It was almost unfathomable."

Now Teahan is helping make sure the one-year anniversary of Pulse does not go unnoticed.

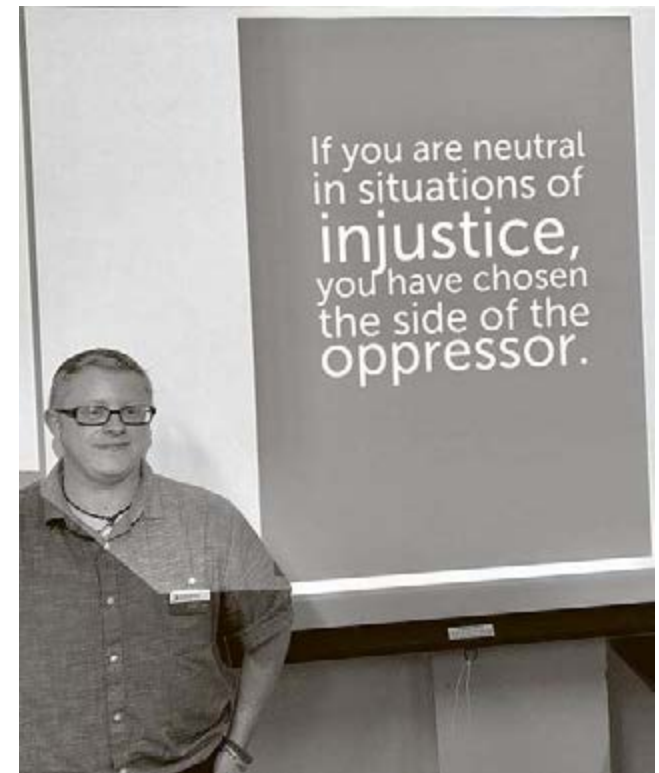

A year after the tragedy, Barry University's Center for Human Rights and Social Justice has created a campaign to make sure Miami's LGBTQ youth feel love, honored and affirmed. Barry's Office of Student Services is handing out yellow ribbons to be worn as a show of support for the LGBTQ community.

Many say the shooting shed light on the consequences of homophobic hate. More importantly, however, it highlighted the world's capacity to stand together and give love and support for the LGBTQ community.

"The campaign is named 'Spread Love Not Hate' because this tragedy was the epitome of hate against LGBT people," said Ashley Austin, an associate professor of social work at Barry. "What we want to make sure one year later we are busy spreading love."

To honor those who have suffered, the Spread Love Not Hate campaign, in
